THE HISTORY AT FORDOUN

Fordoun has been in the Bates family since the late 1940s. European settlers in the area often came from Perthshire in Scotland, and many local names reflect this heritage: Fordoun is named after a lake in Scotland and Skye Bistro is named after the Isle of Skye.

The picturesque hotel and spa were constructed from the farm's original dairy and farmyard buildings, some of which date back to the late 1880s as the home of settler William Taylor. Stonework and yellowwood beams have been preserved as part of the modern Fordoun. An ancient oak tree in the grounds is said to have shaded the coffin of the Prince Imperial, Eugene Napoleon, who was killed before the battle of Ulundi in 1879.

CULTURE AT FORDOUN

Our guests can explore ancient isiZulu ancestral wisdom and natural therapies with Traditional Doctor Elliot Ndlovu, who is both an Inyanga (medicinal healer) and a Sangoma (spiritual healer), as well as a herbalist and ethnobotanist. He and Fordoun's founder, Jon Bates, developed skincare and other products made from indigenous plants traditionally used by sangomas, which are now Fordoun's signature range. Dr Ndlovu has a herbal garden at Fordoun and consults and advises guests. He also continues to work as a traditional healer.

THE SPA AT FORDOUN

Be refreshed in a choice of indoor or outdoor swimming pools. Drift and explore personal inner spaces in the vast floatation pool, once the Fordoun dairy farm grain silo.

GIVING BACK AT FORDOUN

Fordoun is based on a firm philosophy of preserving our history, sustainably protecting our natural environment, and investing in the development of our future. Fordoun land was donated to be incorporated in the neighbouring KZN Crane Foundation, where these endangered birds find refuge. Families of the Fordoun community recently received title deeds to their own homes, built on the property, and the local Esiphetwini Sendiza Preparatory School, known as Hlanganani (meaning 'joining together'), offers a quality comprehensive education for our local youngsters, along with nutritious meals.
